China spends $640 billion on healthcare every year, and represents the most significant growth market in the world for the medical device industry. Importing about 70% of its medical devices, the Chinese market presents tremendous opportunities for U.S. companies, which currently lead the supply of medical devices to China.

With efforts already underway in China to further enhance medical device standardization work, this workshop aims to exchange ideas and share experiences on how to adopt more international standards and do so in a timely manner, promote best practices in standards development and discuss mutual benefits. Through the workshop, U.S. companies will be able to connect with key stakeholders, and discuss issues such as the differences between Chinese and international medical device standards, the relationship between standards and regulations, new type testing requirements and the benefits of accepting reports from internationally accredited test houses.

To learn more about the U.S.-China SCCP or sponsor or participate in a workshop, please visit our website.